

A Postdoctoral researcher or postdoc is a person professionally conducting research after the completion of their doctoral studies. The ultimate goal of a postdoctoral research position is to pursue additional research training or teaching in order to have better skills to pursue a career in academia, research, or any other fields. They continue their studies or carry out research and further increase expertise in a specialized subject, including integrating a team and acquiring novel skills and research methodology. Postdoctoral research is often considered essential while advancing the scholarly mission of the host institution. During this period they are expected to produce relevant publications in peer-reviewed academic journals. Postdoctoral researchers may work independently or under the supervision of a principal investigator.
